UC MEXUS
Resources & Programs
The University of California has long been concerned with Mexico and its faculty members have contributed significantly to analyzing the impact of the United States on Mexico and Mexico's relations with the United States. Activities of such scholars as Herbert E. Bolton (who during the 1930's established the first major program in U.S.-Mexican borderland studies), Ralph L. Beals (who during the 1940's developed studies on village and Indian life in Mexico), Paul S. Taylor (who during the 1940's led the University into examination of Mexican immigrant labor in the United States), and Sanford A. Mosk (who first identified the major configurations of Mexico's industrial revolution), illustrate the UC faculty interests on an important array of topics.

To focus the resources of the University of California as they relate to Mexican studies, in 1980 the University established a fund for activities that led to the establishment in 1981 of the UC Consortium on Mexico and the United States.

The UC MEXUS Consortium coordinates the University of California nine-campus programs related to Mexico and the United States. The broad objectives of the Consortium are:

- to increase the quality, visibility, and effectiveness of existing Mexico-United States projects in the University;
- to strengthen and develop research, exchange programs, and teaching in four principal areas:
  - Mexico studies;
  - U.S.-Mexican relations;
  - Chicano studies; and the physical, biological, health, agricultural, and marine sciences as they focus on Mexico;
- to support interdisciplinary and intercampus projects in any of the four principal areas of focus;
- to coordinate Universitywide requests for extramural funding;
- to produce a journal, a periodic research inventory, and a newsletter for circulation among UC and Mexican researchers as well as appropriate segments of the private and public sectors in the United States and Mexico;
- to facilitate Mexican participation in Program activities
- to act as a source for information on all University-sponsored United States-Mexico activities.
